Wealth is a blessing when properly used, and the mere fact of any man possessing it can by no possibility be held against him unless he came by it through dishonest or fraudulent means. One might ask with some show of reason, where would the nospitals, the infirmaries, the charitable institutions, the halls of learning and the thousand and one great interests of this country be had they not been endowed and assisted by people of means. There are many people in this country today who owe their education and training largely to the benevolence of those who gave of their substance to keep up the schools

The American people are gifted with-a fair average of good sense, and while they may for a time join in the outcry against the capitalist, as such, they can scarcely fail to come back to their normal, rational level and look upon these outbreaks as sensational, injurious, unjust and wholly uncalled for.—New York Ledger.
